Internal, External and Connected Stakeholders

Internal Stakeholders

Internal stakeholders include general groups such as managers and employees (and/or volunteer workers or other types of members, in not-for-profit organisations). For example, the procurement function may have to market itself to senior management or management teams, or may have to communicate changes in purchasing policy and procedures to all staff.

The interests and influence of various internal stakeholder groups are summarised in the table below:

| Directors/ managers                | • The organisation’s profitability, survival and growth
                                        • Fulfilment of objectives and projects for which they are responsible (requiring purchasing inputs and/or support) | • Formal authority over planning
                                        • Shape the commitment and motivation of staff
                                        • Influence through policies, networking and influencing skills                   |
| Staff/team members or other organisation members | • The organisation’s profitability and survival, for continued employment
                                        • Support, information and inputs to fulfil task goals and earn rewards
                                        • Healthy and safe working environment
                                        • Fair and ethical treatment | • Scarcity of resources: competitive edge in times or areas of skill shortage
                                        • Threat of withdrawal of labour
                                        • Potential to add value through skilled, motivated performance, flexibility etc (especially at service) |
| Technical/design function          | • Accurate fulfilment of specifications
                                        • Timely, relevant, expert advice on price and availability issues
                                        • Connection to suppliers who might contribute innovation and expertise | • Determine specifications and materials which the buyer will have to translate into purchase orders |
                                        • Support management and SCM to support flexibility, JIT supply, innovation etc
                                        • Sourcing and procurement services (e.g. capital equipment or consultancy) | • Key internal customer: purchasing performance measured by fulfilment of ‘five rights’
                                        • Provision of feedback on quality of inputs to aid supplier and contract management |
| Sales and marketing function       | • Quality, customisation and delivery levels that will satisfy customers
                                        • Fulfilment of promises made to customers; responsiveness to feedback and demands
                                        • Information on products and delivery schedules for promotions
                                        • Sourcing and procurement services (e.g. printing services, office supplies, sales force cars) or consultancy | • Provision of market research and customer feedback information to influence product specifications and quality management
                                        • Promises made to customers via marketing communications, which purchasing must contribute to delivering |
| Finance/admin function             | • Adherence to financial procedures (e.g. budgetary control, invoicing arrangements)
                                        • Notification of terms negotiated with suppliers (e.g. discounts, payment terms)
                                        • Support for cost control and/or reduction
                                        • Provision of info for budgetary control, costing, credit control etc
                                        • Sourcing and procurement services (e.g. for IT systems and stationery) or consultancy | • Control or influence budget allocations
                                        • Action payment of suppliers
                                        • May impact on supplier relationships (e.g. if payment for supplies is late or withheld)
                                        • May be leaders or champions of cost control and reduction initiatives |
| Storage and distribution/logistics | • Timely info about incoming and outgoing orders, for transport and storage planning
                                        • Policies for ‘green’ transport planning, safe goods handling etc
                                        • Sourcing and procurement services (e.g. for equipment) or consultancy | • Control or influence timely flow of incoming and outgoing deliveries
                                        • Influence on wastage, damage and obsolescence of supplies (e.g. through safe, secure, efficient transport and storage) |
External Stakeholders

Businesses are increasingly aware of the need to maintain a positive reputation in the marketplace, and this may require a more inclusive approach to stakeholder management, which recognises the legitimate needs and concerns of wider, secondary or ‘indirect’ stakeholders.

External stakeholders are likely to have quite diverse objectives and degrees of influence.

Some of the interests and influence of these groups are summarised in the table below:

• Compliance with legislation and regulation
• Reports and returns
• Support for community development and employment | • Power to enforce requirements through legislation, regulation, penalties
• Control over tax levels and public funding (eg via grants)
• Bargaining power as a large customer or supplier of goods or services
• Support and guidance for business |
| Pressure groups (eg Greenpeace) and interest groups (eg consumer associations, trade unions) | • Promotion and increased awareness of a cause or issue (eg fair trade, environment)
• Protection of rights and interests of members
• Access to information and accountability
• Sponsorship or donation funding | • May shape policy (eg via lobbying)
• Inform and mobilise public and consumer opinion for or against the organisation
• Source of info re issues and impacts
• May collaborate to enhance ethical credentials of the firm or brand
• Power to mobilise protests or boycotts |
| Community and society at large | • Access to products and services, employment
• Product safety
• Affordability of essential goods and services
• Socially responsible business and environmental practices: harm minimisation | • Pool of current and potential customers, suppliers and employees
• Power to mobilise government policy and consumer opinion |
Connected Stakeholders

Connected stakeholders often have a significant stake in organisational activity, by virtue of their contractual or commercial relationships with the organisation.

Some of the interests and influence of these groups are summarised in the table below:
